TEE Religious School's Improved Teaching Methods Published in Journal of Jewish Education, Inspire & Engage Families

By Naomi Kall

Parents and kids are giving Temple Emanu El's Religious School two thumbs up for the many improvements in format and content made since the pandemic shut-down. These changes are reviewed in detail in the study, "Out of the Mouths of Yeladim: A Strengths Based Inquiry into a Supplementary Hebrew School," written by Religious School director Eileen Sadowsky. It's based on research she conducted with educator Stacey Steggert, and published in the December 2024 issue of the Journal of Jewish Education.

Some Background on the Study

Sadowsky wrote the paper as part of her certificate in Educational Leadership from a partnership between Mandel Teacher Education Institute \(MTEI\) and Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion \(HUC-JIR\). In the published paper, Sadowsky and Steggert noted that significant changes in religious school organization and teaching approaches grew out of post-pandemic realities as well as demographic changes within the Jewish community.

"Our new model, an inclusive multi-grade one-room Hebrew schoolhouse, grew out of needs presented by the return to school after extended on-line learning due to COVID-19 as well as from existing community population trends," they said. The three driving factors were:

- The increase in variability of knowledge and ability between students of the same grade
- The need to provide socialization and connection for students who had been isolated for an extended period of time
- The need to adhere to health and safety guidelines

This study was undertaken after Sadowsky and Steggert noticed that changes made to the education program's structure resulted in substantial positive feedback from parents, students, teachers, and staff. Through student interviews and subsequent data analysis, they identified important elements for building a successful multi-age mid-week Hebrew program that is responsive to student needs, fosters content mastery, and nurtures a joyful learning community. The eclectic educational approach relies on intentional planning, differentiates learning for a diverse group of students, and is grounded in the values of student autonomy, content mastery, and connection building.

The Long View – One Family’s Perspective

Stephanie and David Reznick, of Orange, are impressed by the transformation they’ve seen at TEE Religious School since pre-pandemic days. Their daughter Lexi, in fifth grade, and son Leo, in kindergarten, attend the religious school every week. When Lexi, 11, started attending in Kindergarten, she learned a lot about Jewish holidays that often included an enemy that hated Jews, which made her scared to be Jewish. But as the curriculum changed post-pandemic, focusing on the meaning behind the holidays, prayer, and Jewish values, she started to be proud to be Jewish. She also learned more with games that made the subjects fun.

“It has become a very positive experience for her, with the building of the community as you're learning those things,” Stephanie said. In fact, the Tuesday night Hebrew school has become such a meaningful part of her education that she attends despite a heavy weekday competitive dance schedule. Lexi told her mom, “I'm going to make Tuesday Hebrew school work. I don't want to miss out.”

Lexi also became friends with one of the Israeli teen Shin-Shinim (emissaries) on staff last year, learning a lot about day-to-day life in Israel. As a result, she developed a connection with Israel on a personal level, and it became a lot less abstract. How does she describe her experience at TEE Religious School? “I love it.”

Lexi’s brother Leo is excited to go to Sunday school every week. Stephanie said, “He really enjoys it too. He’s got his friends and his community there.”

In their paper, Sadowsky and Steggert noted the broad implications of their experience. “How can Jewish educators cultivate a Hebrew program that is intrinsically motivating, exuberantly joyful, and celebrates Jewish identity? In part, supplementary schools must appreciate differences and honor each individual’s unique identity. Modern congregations have learners from interfaith families; learners who are multiracial; learners who struggle in school and those who excel. Some students have been enrolled in supplementary school programs since Pre-K, while others have changed congregations or religious movements.”

A Newer Member Family’s Perspective

Physicians Bryan Benn and his wife Michelle Moh moved in 2022 to Pepper Pike from Elm Grove, Wisconsin, for work at the Cleveland Clinic. Brian was raised in a Jewish home, attending a Schechter Jewish day school, and Michelle is a first-generation Korean American raised in a non-denominational Christian home. Their children are Lauren, age 12, and Nathan, age eight.

Previously, their experience with Jewish education and culture in Elm Grove was through Chabad, the only synagogue nearby. But it wasn’t a good long-term fit for them.

After trying out a few temples in Cleveland, they joined Temple Emanu El in 2022 and enrolled their children in TEE Religious School the next year.

“We’re really happy with the program, really happy with the environment, really happy with the atmosphere. It’s very inclusive, very welcoming,” Bryan said. “When we met Eileen, she was such a warm and welcoming person, introducing us to everyone. And that was great, because one of our biggest concerns is, even though it’s a Reform synagogue, we’re still a mixed couple, and some Reform synagogues are more inclusive and welcoming than others.”

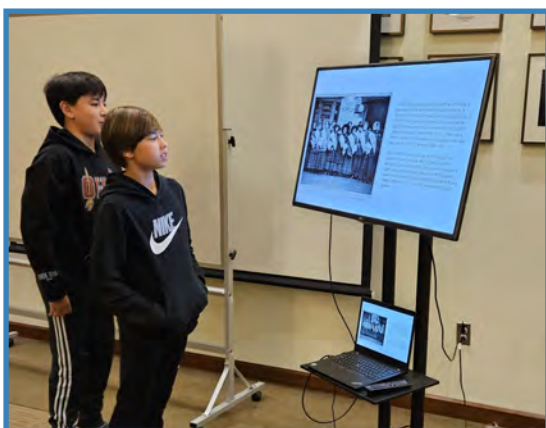

“What I also liked about the place was that that had a lot of life to it. There was a sense of life and community, which I know Rabbi Matt's been really emphasizing a lot this this year, so that's been really nice to see.

“And then from educational standpoint, I think they're doing a really nice balance between emphasizing the traditional kind of pillars of the Jewish service, the prayers, the torah service, and the holidays, but also focusing on the ethnic part of our culture, as opposed to ‘just the book, learn it, memorize it, but don't really understand it.’ We get why we're doing what we're doing. It's a nice balance of the two.”

What about their kids?

“I do think they like it,” he said, “and I think that they've developed a better sense of Jewish identity. I'm not just trying to be an optimistic parent, but because I hear how they reference themselves as being Jewish and knowing that Christmas and Hanukkah are coming and knowing that things are a little bit different for our family. And that's really cool, and that's really nice to see.”

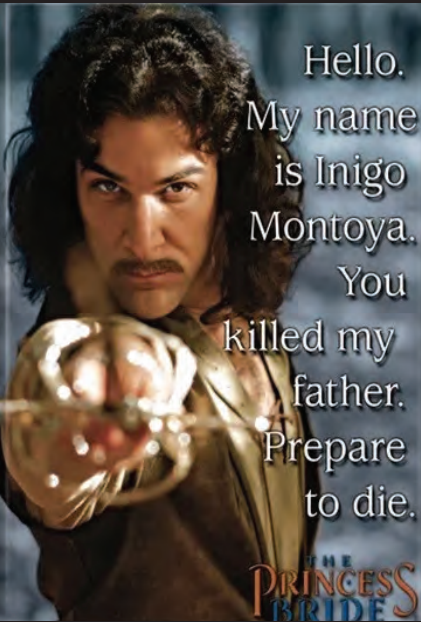

Reflecting on the impact of their new format, Sadowsky and Steggert said, “Educators must respect learners in whatever way they show up and let them know that we are glad they are here. Given the diversity of how people do Jewish, as educators we have to hold space for this variety. The phrase ‘Da Lifnei Mi Atah Omed - know before whom you stand,’ which can be found written above the ark in many synagogues, should be one of the guiding principles that informs supplementary school pedagogy and curricular design.”

THE HOLLYWOOD SIGN

★ The Beginning

The original Hollywood sign was a wooden sign with 13 letters that spelled "Hollywoodland". It was built in 1923 to advertise a real estate development in the Hollywood Hills. The sign was 50 ft. tall and 800 ft. long, and it was illuminated by 4,000 light bulbs.

★ Construction

The sign was designed by Thomas Fisk Goff, owner of the Crescent Sign Company. Mules hauled the poles and materials up the slope of Mount Lee. The sign was intended to last only a year and a half.

★ Maintenance & Alterations

The sign was neglected and weather-beaten during the Great Depression. In the 1940s, the City of Los Angeles refurbished the sign and removed the "-land". In the 1970s, the sign was dilapidated and the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce, (a campaign led by Hugh Hefner) raised money to replace it. In 1978, the original sign was replaced with a steel structure & securely anchored on new footings.

★ Significance

The sign is now owned in part by the City of Los Angeles, the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce, and the Hollywood Sign Trust. The Hollywood sign has become an iconic symbol of Los Angeles.
